DarWrites: Writing Prompts, Book 2, Book design by Darlene Reilley

FIRST EDITION

Thank goodness for awesome writer friends and readers! I'm grateful for the opportunity to talk with you about writing and the writing life. My goal with DarWrites [darwrites.wordpress.com] is to create a place where writers and readers can explore the world of books and learn about art, craft, and inspiration. There will be more coming in 2021.

Remember: You are awesome!

Write on.

867. It had been centuries since they had set foot on the land called Earth. There had been much debate on whether they should return, and I the end, the old ones lost to the newer generations, and the ship had set sail
868. No one remembered the way back, but there was one earmarked tale of the journey, the one record of travel. All others had been banned by the elders centuries ago when the way into the Land was sealed from the inside. Ships could go out, but only those who knew the magic could enter – only those who had predetermined knowledge of the gate, of the watchers, and of the path
869. Over the centuries they had sent ships to determine if it was time to return—safe to return. But they had only learned of the cruelty and warlike people that had inhabited the world

870. The way had been sealed for the set time that was put forth in the degree that the Elders had established when they had gone into the land and sealed the entrance. No one had passed the gate for four generations, and on that journey no one had returned alive
871. The ship was swift, not a small vessel, but a nice size with three masts, the flag of the country waiving in the breeze. The boat itself was silver of color, design, and art
872. The people who had built the ship had vanished centuries ago—but they knew how to handle the boat, what the flaws were—of what little there were
873. As they sailed past the last inlet, they turned and looked back at their homeland: the large silver city sparkled in the midday sun. A hope was with the crew that they would be the ones to bring back good news—that they were no longer in exile, but could return to the world from which they had come and live in peace among its inhabitants
874. The leader of the ship prayed that it would be the outcome. He was prepared for all eventualities, but hoped for the best and prepared for the worst
875. “Hoist the main sail!” He said, and the crew hastened to do as he requested. He was not old—though his youth had passed him some time ago. He was of high stature, had an outfit of white on—the same outfit that his people had been wearing for as long as time recorded. He wore sandals on his feet, and had a crown on his head—it was made of a delicate silver intertwined in the way of a tree branch, holding up stems for the tree that was in his crown
876. “Sire! We have passed the last Post Marker!” The lookout claimed

881. It was a dreary grey day with drizzle and low-hanging clouds. The college campus bustled with activity as always. It was Washington and that meant rain. Leanne wanted to go to school - to a real college - since the 9th grade. Now at thirty-one she finally had the chance
882. Leanne was more than voluptuous - those around her classified her as fat and therefore not worthy of their time. It wasn't something new; she had been dealing with it in some form since childhood
883. The sad thing was she wasn't fat -- more of a Marilyn Monroe or a Hayworth figure than larger. Leanne heard the names since childhood when her breasts developed before everyone else's, and now, later in life, having blossomed, she didn't know she was a rose. If asked, she would identify herself as a daisy or a tulip
884. But I digress, and we have miles to go before anyone can sleep, because what you don't know will kill you. On with the story
885. Leanne tucked a lock of hair behind her left ear and struggled to focus on the math in front of her, but even in the quiet section of the library, people talked. Gossiped.
